

As the guidance counselor for the freshman class at Paul Laurence Dunbar High School, Mona Bond has literally hundreds of students pass through her office each year. As I was walking down the hall at Dunbar the other day, she stopped and asked me how my son was doing. To remember the student is one thing, but to remember the parent of the student is quite another. More remarkable is the fact that my son graduated more than a year ago and was among Bond's freshmen several years earlier. In that time, thousands of students have interacted with her. She not only remembered this student from some five years ago, she recognized his mother.

– Submitted by Jill Kaiser, parent